

I will

I am intrigued by the effects of small actions on the future. Small, seemingly insignificant gestures might have amazingly huge and unpredictable effects on our lives. I decided to explore that moment just after the now that implicitly determines with which choices we are going to be faced in the future.

I will is a project that deals with metaphors of how our thoughts influence our actions and, consequently, our future. It does that by monitoring Twitter for people saying things they intend to do in the future and, through the means of databending techniques, adding to the user's image what he or she said.

The project is currently offline because of recent changes to the Twitter API[2].

I will be in Maryland in less than two hours.

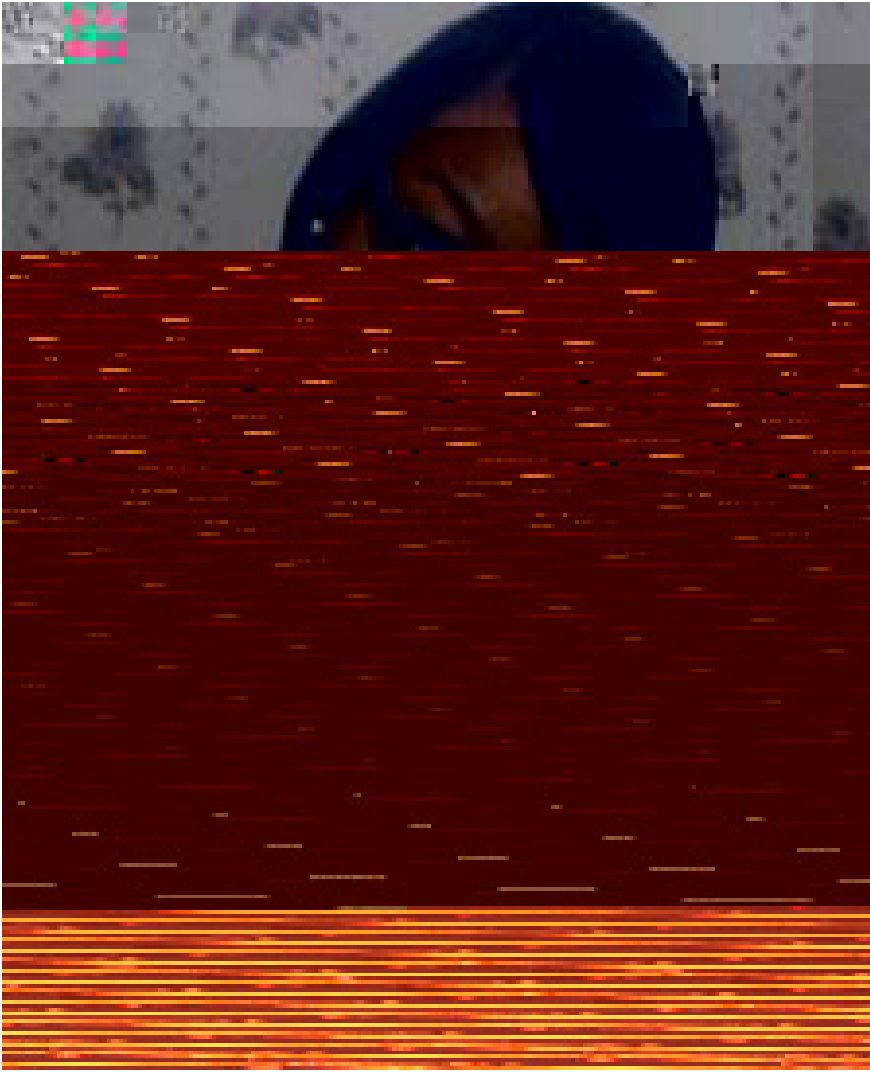

One day I will find something better to do - perhaps get on with writing?

↑ corrupted avatar with the tweet that caused the corruption

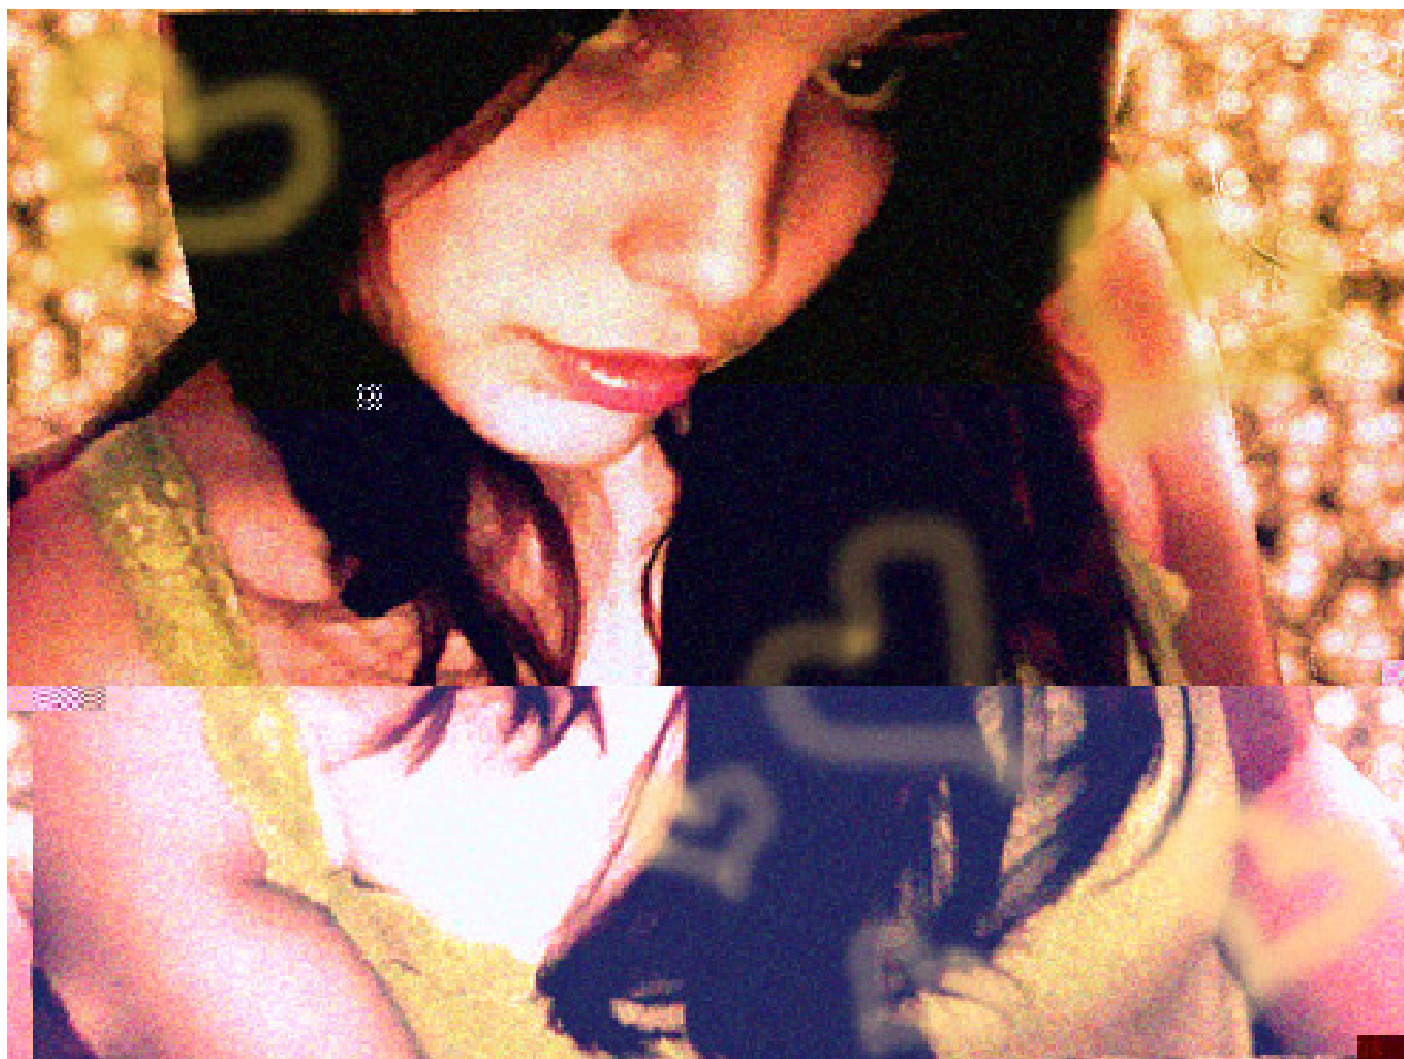

I will continue to campaign against improper use of english in Facebook postings, emails & text messages.

↑ corrupted avatar with the tweet that caused the corruption

I will create 30 minutes in my schedule to exercise each day.

I will remember nice memories and forget the sad from you :)

I made my decision I will text my boo

↑ corrupted avatar with the tweet that caused the corruption

in a spirit of European solidarity I think I will take the entire month ‘off’.