I am a brazilian-italian developer. I am currently based in London and working for British design studio Applied Works, where I mainly focus in developing web application interfaces and data visualisations. I see it primarily as a place where I can hone my technical skills by cooperating with other programmers.

Prior to that, I have been a freelance developer/designer in Italy working for varied clients, from an Italian IT company to Dutch startups to Brazilian businesses, whilst collaborating with designers, programmers and journalists.

In 2012, as part of my education at Hyper Island, I worked as an intern at dutch/turkish design studio Pinar&Viola, taking crucial roles on most technical matters. After the end of the internship, Pinar&Viola and I became constant collaborators. It was there also that I first came to know the Sandberg Institute and its approach to design.

Before that, in 2009, I attained my BA in Communication/Journalism in Brazil. I never practised the profession, but I do feel that most of what I do is permeated by what I learnt there.
